"Upset? You'd be upset, too, if you were as pestered as I am. When I pay good money for a good goose, that should be the end of the business. But all day long, it's been 'Where are the geese?' and 'Who did you sell the geese to?' and 'What will you take for the geese?' You'd think they were the only geese in the world, to hear the fuss that's been made over them."

"Well, I don't know who else has been asking," said Holmes casually. "If you won't tell us, the bet is off, that's all. But I'm always ready to back my opinion on a matter of geese, and I have a fiver on it that the bird I ate is country bred."

"Well, then, you've lost your fiver, for it's town bred," snapped the salesman.

"It's nothing of the kind."

"I say it is."

"I don't believe it."

"D'you think you know more about geese than I, who have handled them ever since I was a nipper? I tell you, those birds were town bred."

"You'll never persuade me to believe that."

"Will you bet, then?" asked the salesman.

"It would be taking your money, because I know I'm right. But I'll bet a sovereign, just to teach you not to be so obstinate."

The salesman snorted. "Bring me the book, Bill," he said.

The boy brought out a great, greasy volume. He laid it beneath the lamp.

"Now then, Mr. Know-It-All," said the salesman, "You see this book?"

"Well?"

"That's the list of the folk from whom I buy. D'you see? Well, then, here on this page are the country folk I buy from. Now, then! You see this other page in red ink? Well, that is a
